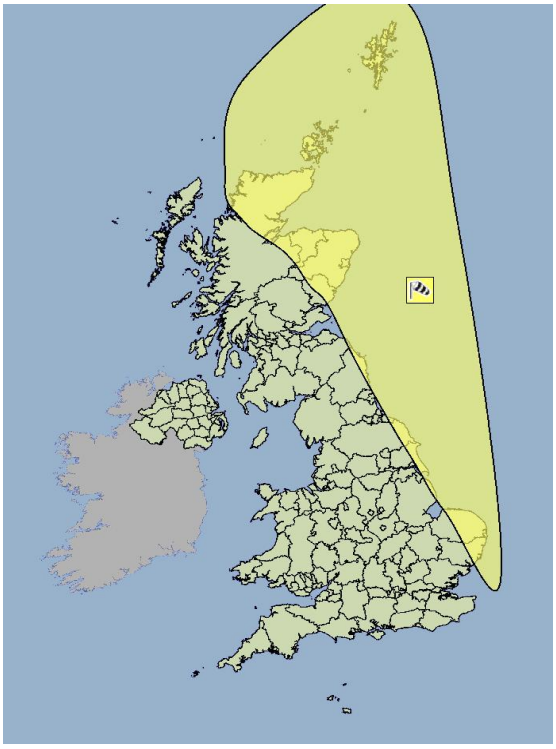
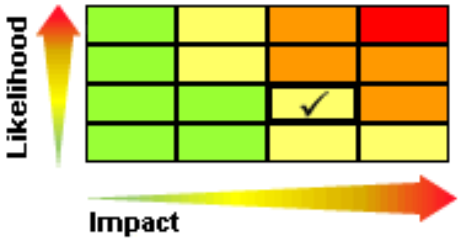
National Severe Weather Warning Service





Chief Forecasters Assessment
A vigorous area of low pressure running southwards across the North Sea will be accompanied by a swathe of very strong winds which will affect many northeastern and extreme eastern areas of the UK.

The Met Office have issued a Yellow Warning of Wind

Valid from 00:05 on Fri, 13th Jan 2017 until 18:00 on Fri, 13th Jan 2017

North or northwesterly severe gales will affect the northeast of Scotland and some eastern coasts of England on Friday. Gusts of 60-70 mph are likely, with gusts of 80 mph likely across the Northern Isles for a time. The strongest of the winds will affect the far northeast during the early hours of Friday and transfer southwards down the east coast of England during the day.

There is a risk of disruption to transport including ferry crossings; the worst of the disruption is likely across northeast Scotland. In addition, large waves affecting coasts may lead to over-topping. The worst of the winds should begin to ease across the Northern Isles late in the night, with winds easing later on Friday across east coasts of England.
